The St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department has been undermanned in a long term trend. An analysis of police-crime ratios by the American Civil Liberties Union of Missouri shows that the department's ratio of sworn officers to civilians is the lowest in St. Louis County. The ACLU says it's the lowest ratio in the state. The St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department's ratio is 58-to-1, meaning it has 58 sworn officers for every 1,000 civilians. The organization says cities with less than 50 officers per 1,000 civilians tend to suffer from worse police-community relations. According to the ACLU, the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department isn't the only department struggling with a shortage of officers. The police department says it has 850 sworn officers. It has had that number for about two decades, but in the past three years, it has been down to 792 officers. The organization also says there are gaps in staffing. The St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department says it has more than 100 officers who are trained to deal with mental health issues. But the organization says the department has fewer than 50 officers trained to deal with such issues as substance abuse and stress management. The ACLU says the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department has been criticized in the past over police brutality. But it says the department is moving to increase diversity. The St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department says it is losing officers. It says the department is giving people opportunities for early retirement. The police department has lost more than 500 officers in the past four years. The department says it has hired more than 100 officers and is working on recruiting officers.The following article is taken from the October 2008 issue of the Journal of the UK Society for Integrative and Comparative Biology.
