A major national study of sewage disposal systems and their connections to protected waterways confirms that the urban environment is becoming increasingly polluted, challenging the ability of sewage treatment plants to work properly and cause contamination of adjacent waterways. The study by the federal Clean Water Act Centre (Centre) for Environmental Technology was released during the late-March water quality conference held in Atlanta. It found that 73 per cent of urban sewer systems in Canada have pollutants that are more toxic than those allowed in wastewater in a 2000 federal standard. Of the more than 1000 sewage systems studied for 2010, 50 per cent discharge five times the pollution allowed under the federal standard. Twenty-four systems, or 2.3 per cent of the sampled sewer systems, discharged more than 30 times the pollution allowed in their wastewater under the 2000 federal standard. Each of these sewer systems exceeds its obligations under the federal Clean Water Act to protect the environment and public health by discharging more than nine times the pollution allowed under the standard, the study found. "When we look at the levels of pollution, you can actually see the results of the situation," said Robert Ross, the lead author of the study and a research associate at the Centre for Environmental Technology. The study, "Health and the Environment in Discharge from Swimming Facilities", was released today at the annual conference of the American Water Works Association. It found that persistent exposure to elevated contaminants in
