The Utah State Board of Education passed a resolution unanimously this week, authorizing the state to partner with the private non-profit organization the National Center for Education Statistics (nces.ed.gov). Fourteen counties in Utah have already signed on to the partnership with nces. “It’s an example of giving every student the ability to be successful,” said USBE vice chairwoman Marie Evans. “We saw something that was going on at the national level where, if students don't understand it, it's much harder for them to be successful in the future." The effort, one of the nation's most innovative education projects, is designed to help state and district school officials better design and evaluate curriculum. "At the heart of these efforts will be the development of effective and rigorous instruction and assessment that responds to local, state and national changes in technology, learning and the economy," according to a statement. Diane Thomas, a spokeswoman for nces, said the effort will provide data and statistics that will help educate teachers and students. But what will students see? "Utah 7th graders will actually sit in the classroom at the middle school," Evans said. "These aren't parent-teacher conferences. The edd6d56e20
