1. Field of the Invention The present invention is concerned with an improved acoustic microphone and, more particularly, an acoustic microphone having an improved structure for conducting acoustic radiation to a sensing element from an acoustic aperture and in which the acoustic aperture is magnetically responsive.

2. Description of the Prior Art The advantages of using electromagnetic means in a microphone have been recognized in the prior art, and many approaches have been proposed. The main advantage offered by electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides is the ability to achieve and maintain a small physical dimension while providing effective means for the transmission of acoustic energy. In the past, this approach has not been successful, primarily because the design and construction of the prior art electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides has been such that the electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides developed such characteristics as to effectively limit the amount of electromagnetic flux which, in turn, limits the effective transmission of acoustic energy through the electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides. In addition, many of the prior art structures required the use of extremely high cost, hand operated construction machinery to fabricate and provide the necessary tooling and cutting means for the final construction of the microminiature, electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides. Another drawback of prior art acoustic waveguides is the absence of an adequate structure for anchoring or positioning the electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides in the desired acoustic communication position. Many of the prior art structures are hand held, thus contributing to a tendency to sloppily position the electromagnetically responsive acoustic waveguides in the desired position. There have been several devices proposed in the prior art that teach the utilization of the influence of an alternating magnetic flux over a magnetic material in order to control the movement of an associated body in response to the transmission of acoustic energy through the magnetic material. Most of the prior art devices, however, are concerned with the control of a mechanical or
