Of these individuals, about 25% suffer from type 2 diabetes, and 70% of the population with type 2 diabetes are severely insulin resistant. These numbers are projected to rise to nearly 100 million over the next 20 years. There are very few treatments available for insulin resistance; current treatment is limited to medications that raise insulin sensitivity, but many of these agents have unpleasant side-effects. The overall goal of this research is to identify molecular targets for the development of new classes of therapies for insulin resistance, with the hope that this work will lead to the development of agents that are safer and more effective. The PI's group is studying several pathways that may be involved in insulin resistance. The most exciting finding to date is that we have discovered that a key protein that increases insulin sensitivity, Akt, is inactivated in type 2 diabetics. Akt is activated by phosphoinositide-3-kinase, a large complex of proteins and phospholipids that is activated by insulin and other growth factors. We have found that a specific complex in the Akt pathway is absent in diabetics, and this defect is corrected by treatments that raise insulin sensitivity. Importantly, when the missing complex is restored to diabetic patients, there is a marked increase in insulin sensitivity. These findings have led to the discovery of a novel target pathway in insulin resistance, which may lead to new treatments for type 2 diabetes. Other work in this area is exploring the mechanism of glucose transporter expression in skeletal muscle and the role of ceramide in insulin resistance. A manuscript describing this work was published in J Clin Invest in May, 2007. We
