Road workers in the center of the country continued with their 12-hour a day strike on Monday, thwarting scheduled traffic in the capital, local media reported. But in the towns around Belgrade, where most of the workers are employed, the general strike hit Saturday's traffic only partially and the volume of goods on the road remained the same. Road workers in Belgrade have been on strike since Friday after new mandatory insurance regulations were introduced to the country on September 1. The road workers say that they are not ready for the changes and that the new system is expensive and undermines the savings made over the years. The government says that it is introducing the changes to make the road work safer and better for everyone. The strike on Monday was called on Friday night but it lasted only two hours in some places. The strike then continued sporadically on Saturday and was scheduled to end at midday. However, some of the workers stayed on the road overnight on Saturday. The road workers are demanding back pay for the lost work. Groups of road workers in Belgrade protested on Sunday against the government's decision to impose the insurance changes. The road workers staged a rally in the city center and blocked some of the main streets in the Belgrade suburbs. The protest was mostly peaceful, with police only using water cannons to disperse the crowd. There were no serious injuries. The road workers have called a general strike on Wednesday, demanding that the minister of infrastructure and works, Danilo Todorčić, be fired and that the government agrees to a meeting with the trade unions to discuss the issue. A presidential statement from Saturday said that the government is in dialogue with the road workers' trade unions and that the government is ready to pay the workers' claims for lost wages and to take over their previous insurance system, according to RTS. But trade unions claim that the government doesn't want to meet with them as this would mean the loss of hundreds of millions of dinars in profits from the government. Earlier in the week, the government also urged the trade unions to stop the strike. Some of the trade unions said on Saturday that they will hold a protest on the

The president of Maine's largest utility plans to file a formal petition to start a two-year legislative review to explore the future of Maine's electric grid, which could be the first step in reducing Maine's heavy dependence on Canadian energy. U.S. Rep. Mike Michaud, a Democrat whose district encompasses the North Maine Power-Gridley service territory, said Wednesday that he plans to file the petition with the Legislature next month, saying the existing grid cannot accommodate the increasing reliance on wind and solar power. "I think it's going to be an important part of the effort to evaluate what our future should be," Michaud said. The state will have the power to opt out of the petition process, as long as it does not reject the petition, he said. Michaud said the petition would raise many questions about the future of energy in Maine, including how to ensure that demand for electricity from a growing population doesn't exceed the amount of energy that can be produced from renewable sources. He said any new renewable energy proposals would need to be carefully reviewed. "I would love to see Maine take a leadership role, not just nationally, but internationally,” he said. Michaud said he was not working with any particular company on the petition and that the process was being driven by the state grid operator, which is developing a blueprint for state energy policy. Maine American Water, which operates more than 300 dams on the Kennebec River system, has helped fund the grid operator to develop that plan, Michaud said. Maine Energy Market, the grid operator, declined comment. “This is something that we’re very interested in,” Michaud 1d6a3396d6
