Share this article on LinkedIn Email Red Bull is adamant its engines are not the problem in Formula 1. Just three races into a campaign that it hopes will take its performance to new heights, the team has been hit by a series of reliability problems. After enduring an aggressive start to the season at the Australian Grand Prix, Toro Rosso and Red Bull are now at odds over the cause of the noise that is emanating from RB12's engine. When asked by AUTOSPORT to comment on the issue, Red Bull team principal Christian Horner said the engines were not the problem. "We believe that the engine is not the problem at the moment," Horner said. "There is no evidence that points to that. "It is the car construction that we are trying to improve. "We have not changed our engine supplier, it has the same supplier as McLaren, Mercedes, Ferrari and Renault." Horner conceded Red Bull was not happy with its performance and suggested progress might be made in Bahrain, which is the team's home race. "I think we could improve from where we are currently," he added. "I would say Bahrain is the race where the best of our current potential is going to be seen. "We have also an opportunity to set the benchmark [for the season]." Red Bull is the only team in Formula 1 not to have fielded a solution to the problem - which is affecting the RB12 since pre-season. The engine noise that has been a feature of F1 for years was revealed to be a state-of-the-art, hush-hush noise-cancelling device Red Bull has used since F1 began.
