Polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is one of the basic techniques for the molecular genetic identification of microbial pathogens. Further, PCR has been adopted as a method for genetic analysis of mammals, including humans, and in recent years for genetic analysis of plants as well. In the PCR, an oligonucleotide primer is used which is complementary to a predetermined region of the specific gene and which is preferably labeled with a radioactive or fluorescent label, or an enzyme, to produce a complementary DNA (cDNA) by a reaction with a single stranded DNA such as a double stranded (ds) DNA. This product is amplified by a reaction with another oligonucleotide primer which is complementary to another predetermined region of the specific gene to cause hybridization of the two oligonucleotide primers and subsequent amplification of the cDNA in the form of a dsDNA. Amplification of target DNA is usually carried out in a tube, the reaction is usually stopped by adding a finishing agent such as ethylenediaminetetraacetic acid (EDTA) to terminate a polymerase reaction or by terminating the polymerase reaction and adding a finishing agent such as EDTA, and the amplified products are analyzed. The primer design is one of the most important steps in order to obtain accurate DNA sequencing results. For example, in order to enhance
