After extensive research into worm threats in 2009, we determined that the best way to prevent the spread of online threats such as Beagle, Sasser and various Ransomware would be to make our security product available to the public. "Beagle" viruses are a very particular threat, because they spread by grabbing onto existing files on a system and then using that same process to spread to other files on the same system. This means that it is virtually impossible to kill the virus with antivirus products alone. The most important thing to know about the worm is that it spreads in the same manner as other malware. If the user is not the owner of the computer, or has the operating system set to automatically launch at startup (which is a bad thing for anti-malware products to be doing automatically), when the worm executes it uses the Windows Task Scheduler to schedule itself to run at startup, in this case daily. If there is no program installed on the computer to auto-launch at startup, the worm will show the error message "This program is unable to run automatically. Please set the program to run as a start-up." The worm opens a backdoor that permits the worm to download additional components from a C&C server. These components are mostly Java-based and include a HTTP web server, backdoor program, and a Java Virtual Machine. The most important thing you will notice when the worm is executed is that it runs directly under the Windows Task Scheduler and there is no visual indication that the worm is being executed. The worm also creates additional system processes that make the process much longer than it should be. The worm can connect to the same C&C server multiple times in order to download more components. Once the worm completes the download, it will continue to infect other files on the system in order to propagate the worm.
