A winter storm sending snow and ice into the U.S. Northeast put pressure on a deal between Mexico and the United States on trade and migration. The two countries announced a deal on Jan. 15 to stem the flow of migrants and drug smugglers along their border, but they didn't reach an agreement on temporary protected status for immigrants from Mexico and Central America. President Trump objected to the no-backlogs deal, saying in a Twitter post on Jan. 16 that it would "destroy ICE [Immigration and Customs Enforcement] and our Country cannot allow this to happen!" Mexico actually drafted the initial "Safe Third Agreement" along with the U.S., without the president's involvement, and his objections led to the negotiations sputtering. The final deal does include requirements for Mexico to "control its southern border" and should make it more difficult for immigrant and drug smugglers from Central America to enter the U.S. "This is a big issue," says Steven Kopits, an immigration expert at Princeton University. "I think what we see from Trump is a very troubling trend — a tendency to be very protectionist and to protect the country." Kopits says even though Trump has tools to try and limit migration, like funding for his own wall and cutting immigration to the U.S. from the Middle East, Trump would be wrong to use them. "It just seems counter-productive — even if he does have the desire and ability to stop migrants from coming from Mexico, it will actually end up making the problem worse because you then push the migrants into crossing illegally through the southern border," he says. The deal also includes an agreement that requires Mexico to change its laws so that they're more in line with the U.S.
