Creating a new Photoshop document A lot of great tutorials are available on the Internet that show you how to use Photoshop. In this book, I assume that you're using Photoshop CS6. However, you can use Photoshop CS3, CS4, or CS5 without too many problems, even if you don't have that specific version. This book will work with all the later versions too. As you create your image, you need to make sure that you have a document with a resolution of 300 dpi. The pixel dimension of a digital image is a specification of the pixels in a digital image and determines the number of pixels that an image will actually contain. The higher the number, the better the image quality. Images with a resolution of 72 dpi have a low-quality pixel dimension. High-quality images have a pixel dimension of 300 dpi. In this section, I explain why you need to have a resolution of 300 dpi. Photoshop CS6 has a new Import dialog box that comes with a new option on the File menu. Clicking the icon for this option opens the Import dialog box, as shown in Figure 5-1. Figure 5-1: The Import dialog box enables you to create a new Photoshop document, as shown here. If you want to continue working with a previously created Photoshop document, make sure that you see the Open dialog box instead of the Import dialog box. To open a Photoshop document, choose File⇒Open. Checking the resolution of a document When you make a digital image, you create and save it as a Photoshop document in order to use Photoshop tools to manipulate your image. If you want to save a file for Web use, you need to make sure that the resolution of the file is 300 dpi; otherwise, the quality of the image will be very low when viewed on a standard monitor. On a standard monitor, the quality of an image is represented by the size of the dots that make up the image. If you view the image in a small window, the dots are small, and the image appears blurry and washed out. If you view the image in a larger window, the

Q: Is it ok if I constantly add new entries in a database even if it's only going to be a boolean value? I have a website where users can create and submit notes. If the user adds a note and it is approved, the note will be added to a database table. If the note isn't approved (and doesn't get submitted via a form, I click a link to approve it), it is removed from the database. My Question is: Is it safe or dangerous to add new values into the database all the time? These are only booleans. Should I only add values into the database that are going to be persistent? Do I have to worry about a certain percentage of notes in the database turning into spam? This is for a private notes system for a business. The data in the database is kept private, but it's still public so any note can be found and read. A: This is all about how you're using it. If you're just using it to track notes, or are going to use it to track something else, and it's only a boolean value, I wouldn't be concerned. However, if you're going to use it to log what the user has done on your site (whether it be add a note, select one, add another, etc), I'd say this is a little more hazardous. It's a simple boolean value. People aren't going to use it to identify themselves (unless of course you have a policy on what they can do with it), but they can run a user script that will add all of their notes. So, it's a simple value, but don't be afraid to use it as a means to track their actions for future projects. Meet Blade, the deadly-stylin' ninja of gnomes A ninja who listens to music while he does his work, that's all we know about this very ninja. Or maybe it's more than that. Maybe we have the wrong thread and have been knitting all this time while we fail to see what's being shrouded by the toasty new avatar of the internet. Oh hell, forget about it. Let's just go with the random assumption that we know nothing about this ninja, besides that he's peaceful, a cross-dresser, and so deadly that he even goes
