Thanks! A: I suspect you're confused by the confusion of the file ownership of the directory you're in and the actual physical files. You're in /home/teammate, which as you say has the owner teammate. What you're seeing as the root of that directory is actually a symbolic link to /home/teammate/workshop, which itself is owned by root. So your actual user teammate is in /home/teammate, and when he creates the file (which has the same owner as /home/teammate), the result is that the executable that is opened (when you run your script) has its effective userID (set to your userID, in this case teammate) set to root, which is the effective userID of the mounted drive. Then you move to /home/teammate/workshop. This is a directory owned by root. At this point, the original link from /home/teammate is still pointing to /home/teammate/workshop, so the second time you move to /home/teammate/workshop you are there, and the effective userID is set to your userID, teammate, which is the same as the actual physical file.
