What's new in Blaster Simulator:

In the fall of 1983, I was in college and had just started working full time. I was going from classes, to classes, to “real life” and wanted to make progress fast. But instead of “progress”, I had only progressed. Instead of taking a step forward, I had taken two steps back. My parent’s house in 1979. My mother, mother-in-law, father and sister. Everyone slowly got sick. I suddenly was alone in “the world”, not like when my mom and dad would take me for the weekend. This time, I was the only one with my parents. Their neurologist told them that their (fortunately) non-autistic daughter would have to move from their home into an adult care facility. I was scared. And horrified. But another student had that oncology rotation around the same time and so I was able to go on living my normal life. I would stay with them for a few days and then back to school. I knew that my parents would probably not make it. I had come to terms with that when I saw the doctors and had listened to the prognosis several times. But that had been a fairly benign prognosis, certain rather than outright expected. I did not expect them to die. I was 11 at the time. How did it feel? It didn’t feel like they were dying; it felt like when my parents would have me on vacation and their autistic son, seven years older than I was, would hand me a tennis ball to throw and my mom and dad would run after me and my brother and sister as we played game after game. That is how I felt. Not tragic. Not actually feeling anything. Just playing with my family. My parents and two autistic brothers and a one year older sister. That’s how I felt; that is how I still feel. My father died in 1983. He passed in March, well within the bounds of a three-month-old man’s life expectancy. But just a few months before that, he had developed a passion for things: ranging from different kinds of music, to people. Within him, I saw the culmination of this passion in the last months of his life, as he spent hours and hours talking to people. I saw my parents go through this their last year of life. I saw them discuss my mother’
