Other tiles Detective Conan Movie 17, Meitantei Conan: Sekkai no PrivateÂ .Microsoft is betting on the web browser as its front door to the next wave of computing, and the Internet Explorer browser is a key piece in that strategy. For most consumers, this will simply mean a browser to surf the Internet and play the latest games, but Microsoft wants to take the browser to the next level and build a cross-platform system to orchestrate everything you do. Right now, the Xbox, Microsoft's living room powerhouse, is a web-centric device. You can play games, watch Netflix and YouTube videos, send Skype messages, access Windows games and entertainment content, and even chat and share content with friends and family. But what if you didn't need a TV? Microsoft plans to build a set-top box that will let you access these same services and content streamed to your TV from the Internet. Meanwhile, as part of this effort, Microsoft is creating Internet-based apps that run on Windows Phone, Windows RT, and Windows 8 on PC and tablet form factors. The company sees the browser-based approach as the key to its big picture and is banking on this platform to help move customers from the offline world to the new mobile web.

Streaming the good stuff In order to host content, Internet Explorer on Windows 8, RT and Windows Phone must use technology called HTML5. HTML5 is designed to run on many devices. It's another technology that Microsoft believes its devices, like tablets and phones, will be able to support in the future. HTML5 also has a "future" component. It's the direction the Internet and its many content providers are moving in. The difference is that it's not a new technology, but rather a bigger shift that is taking place to make the Internet adapt to consumer needs. HTML5 is designed to run on many devices. HTML5 currently supports a limited number of devices, such as smartphones and some tablets. But in the future, it will be the de facto standard for delivering content online. That means in the future, it's not just HTML5-based sites that you can access on a mobile device that will run on the Internet. As your access to content online evolves, it will no longer be just a browser that you use, but rather
