A redox complex mimic, derived from the naturally occurring cytochrome c peroxidase (CcP), was synthesized. Its electrochemical response and charge transport properties have been investigated in detail and compared to those of the original CcP and of the intermolecular electron transfer proteins cytochrome c (Cyt c) and horse heart Cyt c. Compared to the native proteins, the reduced complex [CcP(SH)2]2- behaves as an electron mediator with a more negative reduction potential. Furthermore, the mobility of the electron transfer process through the [CcP(SH)2]2- biomimetic complex is similar to that through CcP and Cyt c. The reduced complex is also a redox mediator with redox activity that can be used in the construction of a two-electrode amperometric system. Therefore, we demonstrate the electrochemical feasibility of using [CcP(SH)2]2- as a stable source of mediator for the fabrication of biosensors. A carbon electrode modified with the complex [CcP(SH)2]2- was used as a mediator of peroxidase-oxidase reaction, allowing the development of amperometric biosensors for the detection of phenol, glucose, lascorbate, and hydrogen peroxide.
