Note: All links point to the most recent snapshot of the Netflix API source code available in the public repository at Google Code. Don't forget to follow the links above if you want to keep up with changes as they occur. Help support the website by donating via Patreon These are the sources. As you can see, the API became a bit more complicated to set up in the change log. For example, we had a small upgrade of the timeout as well as some changes to the environment variable generation. On top of that, we used new API endpoints and added a new HTTP method to the API root - GET. This provides a cross-platform way to fetch the API keys, which is particularly useful when developing on Mac or Linux. The new endpoint is API.netflix.com/p/get_key. This only makes sense if the endpoints are public, so we now have a new endpoint for this: metadata.netflix.com/p/get_key. Be aware that you need to use this endpoint when you want to access the "API Key" section of Netflix's device setup tool. You also can see that the new endpoint is published in the public repo and, so make sure to follow the links above if you don't want to wait for Netflix to update their endpoints. Hopefully this gets you going with your new, more complicated API. Let us know what you think, and we will continue to monitor Netflix's API. To get you up to speed, Netflix updated the API in the change log. Here are some of the updates: Allowed Network Requests to the API Root URL changes and new permissions Added Endpoints to Require Client Credentials Added Endpoints to Require Client Credentials Client Secret becomes Client Key New Client Key The Client Key has been changed to Client Key, which will be used to call Requests. The Client Key was previously the Client Secret. The Client Key is used to
