A: There's no way to know this without us knowing your post is a not-malicious reply to a comment. If you're getting spam, that's not an indication of anything, not a single thing. Being a spammer doesn't make you either intelligent or malicious, just stupid, and it doesn't make someone who is part of the site stop participating. If you're getting comment spam on the main site, even though you're one of the Mods, what we can only suggest is either: Report it as such, in a separate thread where it belongs. We can't, and won't, regulate any of your activity in the context of your main account; and you've not shown us enough evidence to take a closer look. Continue to post as you are doing, but try to be more careful with entering short, almost-meaningless comments (which one of my posts is getting through as at time of writing) If you see someone else with a similar account reporting a comment as spam and that action is being followed with an attack on the account (deletion of the account, blacklisting of the comment author, etc), then that's not on the main site, it's on the comments-only network meta. If you're getting a lot of comment spam and most of it is mod-rejected or flagged, that's an indication that you have a large body of users who are just terrible at commenting. The last possibility is if you're getting a lot of comment spam and it's mod-rejected or flagged but, for whatever reason, you're still an active user on the site. We, or another system, will clean those up and then you'll get a suspension if we find the clue that you're actually a spammer. If you're getting comment spam that is not mod-rejected or flagged but you have a pending suspension, that's a clue that you're a spammer and that you'll get your suspension lifted and a warning if you show some remorse. If you're getting comment spam that is not mod-rejected or flagged and you don't have a pending suspension, nothing more than that can be done for now. If you're getting comment spam on meta (or on Meta Stack Exchange), that's a bad sign. We get many spam/neo-spam attempts, and the problem is: How do we deal with them? If they're spam, they're spam
