Salvatore Morris, 38, known as the "joker," was killed inside an apartment at 706 W. 26th St., according to police. He was the first suspect in a double murder case involving the beating deaths of two men — 47-year-old Dennis McGuire and 32-year-old David McKay — in a home at 800 W. 28th St. "We don't think there's a link to the Englewood case" except that both were death-by-asphyxiation cases, Chicago Police Superintendent Eddie Johnson told reporters. "It was the first time they worked together in a murder case," Johnson said. "So we just wanted to make sure they were together and still did it." McGuire was a convicted felon and registered sex offender who, like Morris, was awaiting a jury trial. For a long time, there was a widespread belief that his work as a pharmacist had afforded him a familiarity with prescription drugs that had helped him kill a homeless woman, Cherrell Carter, as she huddled in the cold waiting for police officers to respond to a burglary call in the nearby Gage Park neighborhood. But a defense attorney who represented McGuire in 2008, when he was convicted of strangling Carter in the 2900 block of South Morgan Street, told the Tribune in an interview that his client's pharmacist background was relevant to 6d1f23a050
