aminopeptidase N in permeabilized L1210 cells.
The binding specificity of L1210 cell cytosolic aminopeptidase N for natural and synthetic amino acid substrates was studied with intact cells and permeabilized cells.
When intact cells were used, aminopeptidase N preferred to cleave

H2B and single-chain sheep erythrocyte histidine-rich protein. However, the preference for Ala-2-Ala in these two substrates was lost in permeabilized cells, which suggested the binding specificity of aminopeptidase N could be determined by the conformation of its binding site. Aminopeptidase N bound to histone H2B and single-chain sheep erythrocyte histidine-rich protein with similar specificities. By incubating purified aminopeptidase N in permeabilized cells with each substrate, the binding site for each substrate was mapped by degradation of H2B and single-chain sheep erythrocyte histidine-rich protein. The results indicate that each binding site of aminopeptidase N differs from that of gamma-glutamyl transpeptidase and that the binding site was located at the C terminus of the substrate.
