Emergency contraception (EC) is the most reliable form of contraception available to women who become pregnant following sexual assault (SA). Accompanying the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) recommendation to provide EC to SA survivors is a call for emergency departments (EDs) to proactively offer EC to female SA survivors. To provide a comprehensive review of the existing literature and make recommendations for ED and hospital policy related to the offer of EC to SA survivors. A research librarian conducted searches in PubMed and PsycInfo using the terms emergency contraception, emergency contraception access, sexual assault, and emergency department. Papers published through July 2005 with complete English language abstracts were included. Emergency contraception was reported to be commonly prescribed to SA survivors in EDs, but on a case-by-case basis. Nurse-midwives/family nurse practitioners (NMPs) and clinical nurse specialists (CNSs) were reported to be the most common providers of EC to SA survivors. Patients would prefer to receive EC in an ED setting, and nurses and NMPs were reported to have the skills to provide EC. No studies were found that examined post-EC rates of pregnancy or STIs. Given the lack of evidence demonstrating a decrease in STI rates following EC, the lack of evidence demonstrating a decrease in rates of pregnancy following EC, and the preference of patients and providers for EC to be provided in the ED, current literature supports ED EC to be an important part of the SA survivor's care in emergency settings. The CDC recommendation to routinely offer EC to SA survivors should be
